WATER TOWER OF LUCERNE

Archive, treasury and prison

The Water Tower is one of Lucerne's most well-known landmarks. Built in the first half of the 14th century, it predates the Chapel Bridge.

The old stork's nest, which hasn't been occupied in a century, isn't its only noteworthy characteristic. The tower is octagonal in form, a shape that Kaiser Friedrich II loved and favoured for his most beautiful buildings. From its roof to the ground, the water tower measures 34.5 metres. Its circumference is a full 38 metres.

In its long history, the enormous structure has served various purposes. First it was a defence and watchtower, and later it was used as an archive, treasury and preparation chamber. With walls measuring 4-5 metres thick, the lowest room was used as a prison cell.

Its interior was completely dark, and the poor prisoners who came there had to sit on a toggle and be lowered into the cell through a hole. There was also a torture chamber in the late Middle Ages.

Today, the middle floor is home to the headquarters of the Lucerne Artillery Association.
